I was in the middle of writing my book on the Buddhist Six Element meditation at the time, and a phrase that's important in that meditation practice — "This is not me; this is not mine, I am not this" — sprung spontaneously into my mind. This shame was not me, not mine. I was not my shame. I was not my performance.

I can understand this, and it would be distressing and upsetting. But is the person not themselves, or are they just being stimulated in a different way that is causing changes in the way they express themselves. To me, being myself is about my genetic make up. I am myself due to my unique gene sequence.
