Research and preparation is always the most important part of writing, and for feature profiles, the interview often is the most important step in putting together a strong story. When sitting down to write the profile, care with putting pen to paper will help you bring the person to life in a way that is genuine, believable, and interesting.

How to Write a Compelling Profile of a Person

Life Stories: Profiles from The New Yorker, edited by David Remnick Finished up with the excerpts from The Fun of It , a collection of "Talk of the Town" pieces from The New Yorker . Before that, I posted some excerpts from The New Gilded Age , a collection of financial writing from The New Yorker during the late 1990s, a heady insane time.

Profiles need an angle, or a specific focus to sustain the reader's attention. A unique angle will set your profile apart from the other material written on the same subject. Use an angle that is newsworthy or contains the essence of the business' philosophy. Profiles that are simply a list of things that happened are rarely interesting.
