The second question that arose from our case studies addresses whether or not the relationships in the theoretical model vary depending on the supplier's level of responsibility in the buyer's new product development process. In support of this question, we adopt the model of supplier level of responsibility proposed by Handfield et al. (1999) and Monczka et al. (2000) (as shown in Fig. 3).

We examine the extent to which institutional investors herd in the U.S. corporate bond market and the price impact of their herding behavior. We find that the level of institutional herding in corporate bonds is substantially higher than what is documented for equities, and that sell herding is much stronger and more persistent than buy herding.
